History is a systematic record of past events. This the drama and the historical novel seldom presume to offer us, tho the claim is commonly made that the stories they tell are based on actual fact. In most instances, however, the historic occurrences they embody are extremely few in number, and at that are often so distorted that the result, however interesting, may Justifiably be described as, not history but fiction, the product of imagination. Sometimes the condition is an expression of ignorance. Novelists and dramatists are not necessarily historians. A gain, nothing succeeds like success. Let a book attain popularity and forthwith a host of imitations are launched to share its good fortune. And tho the original may have sprung from real historic understanding, the others usually constitute the brood of the little knowledge that is dangerous. Frequently mercenary motives contribute to the situation. Prevailing prejudices are catered to, because popular favor has a money value. The average reader prefers entertainment to instruction, and resents criticism. That is the reason that a prophet is seldom a popular idol; why the man with a message seldom has an audience; and why the ten talent man, giving public expression to beliefs generally entertained, nearly always scores an instantaneous success. Furthermore, some writers purposely misinterpret the facts of history to further an unworthy cause in which they have enlisted. Ability and honor are not always synonyms. Many a genius sent to bless, remains only to curse. Witness the Jew in fiction. A caricature, and yet not a surprise. For however much writers impress their personality on their work and the people of their day, they still voice and interpret the national consciousness. Reading the novels of Disraeli, Brandes finds sufficient biographic material to fashion a life of the author. Reading the
