This book will take booklovers back in time to a period where our nation was trying to be "a nation." A new power force in the 18th century the US was young and in its puberty. However, the women and men of the times were insightful and humble to admit that everyone of their actions would be imitated and observed by all.

The First Ladies of the US lived in an era where passion for nationalistic and independence values were clamoring around the world. The French had their revolution, and so did we. The Spanish Empire was collapsing and the subjugated were stepping out and fighting for freedom. People believed in women rights and women were not afraid to say so. Our nation's natives were been conquered, American slavery was surging and entrepreneurs from around the world were flocking to the US for freedom and wealth. The frontier was just steps away from the eastern shore, no luxury or establishment, just opportunity.

This is when Martha Washington raised to power and so in turn every First Lady. Their stories developed smoothly throughout time and to this day Martha Washington's choices are shaping us.

The author and artist has painted their portraits, 37 Paintings that quickly show that--The First Ladies of The United States have been a force to be reckoned.

The role of a First Lady is nowhere defined, yet always scrutinized, sometimes for the better, sometimes not. All these ladies are owed admiration and awe for assuming a role few understand and many dismiss. Their lives and service to the nation inspire compassion, mercy and high esteem. Each painting statement relays that more than a portrait of a political figure each pose is a celebration to their lives.

To some of these Ladies we owe the advancements of today, to others the backsliding or stagnation. Yet, from all of them, one learns that a First Lady can change the world.
